Previous studies have demonstrated an increase in IgG in tears of human subjects and a significant correlation between the tear IgG level and disease activity in the rat. These findings suggested that the IgG is involved in the drainage function of the rat lacrimal gland. In this study, the effect of IgG on lacrimal gland function was tested by examining the effect of a locally delivered IgG1 antibody on the rat lacrimal gland. A monoclonal IgG1 antibody was covalently coupled to polylysine and administered into the rat left lacrimal gland by bolus injection. Six days after administration, damage to the gland occurred. This was indicated by a substantial reduction in the total tear volume produced from the gland and the observation of characteristic histopathologic changes in the glandular tissue. A similar degree of damage was not observed with equivalent quantities of polylysine-coupled IgG2a, a control antibody. These studies provide the first in vivo evidence for the involvement of IgG in lacrimal gland function and suggest that IgG-mediated cytotoxicity may contribute to the etiology of some forms of dry eye disease.Q: Slow performance on large matrix multiplication I am working on a very large matrix (about 100k rows and 8k columns) and my problem is that the calculations on each element of c6a93da74d
